Commission publishes Expert Group report on methods to assess access to healthcare

European Commission

The report shows how a better measurement framework can make an impact on a broader policy context through mitigating consequences of accumulated social, economic and health disadvantage.

It explores three types of tools such as measures of equitable distribution of health benefits; patient vignettes (mental, dental, stroke care); tools which can be used at national level to better understand hurdles experienced by vulnerable groups.

Access to water -a major driver of health inequalities for Roma

Access to clean water and sanitation is of utmost importance for tackling public health challenges, but also ensuring individuals' and communities' health prevention. Improving water supply contributes to reducing health and social inequalities between and within countries and this is essential for vulnerable groups, such as Roma who struggle to access clean water and sanitation despite existing frameworks addressing access to water.
